NOTICE.

In the orthography of the Gaelic names of Melodies printed in this work, O'Reilly's Irish-English Dictionary has been followed as the standard of authority.

Tools for engraving the modern Irish alphabet were manufactured in Chicăgo specially for this purpose—the largest Irish printing type obtainable in the city being used as models. They are said to be the first of their kind made in America.

The classification of the Melodies into distinctive divisions may to a certain extent be considered arbitrary. All double (or six-eight time) jigs when played in slower time serve as excellent quick steps or marches, while most jigs and many reels and hornpipes were originally airs to which songs were sung.

INTRODUCTION

There is perhaps nothing of which an Irishman may feel more justly proud than the melodies and music of his native land. Whatever tone of feeling they assume, whether of cheerfulness or of tenderness, of wild merriment or of deep sorrow, there is in them a grace and delicacy of feeling and force and earnestness of passion such as we in vain look for in the music of any other country, and which as an unerring index of national character is most honorable to our one time land of song.

Competent authorities have proclaimed that no country possesses a richer melody than Ireland. Its liquid sweetness is almost as boundless as the waters which bathe her shores. It produces the upmost enthusiasm in the hearers and will either melt the heart with pity or love, or inspire it with the noblest emotions.

On this subject I may be permitted to quote certain remarks from the poetic pen of Thomas Moore who justly observes that "It has often been remarked and still oftener felt, that in our music is found the truest of all comments upon our history. The tone of defiance succeeded by the languor of despondency-a burst of turbulence dying away into softness-the sorrows of one moment lost in the levity of the next, and all that romantic mixture of mirth and sadness which is naturally produced by the efforts of the lively temperament to shake off or forget the wrongs which lie upon it."

"Such are the features of our history and character which we find strongly and faithfully reflected in our music, and there are even many airs which recall some period or event to which their expression seems applicable."

True melody, the music of the soul, has no mortal artist for its inventor. It has been implanted in man's nature as a pure and heavenly gift by the Creator, and the greatest masters of the musical art in modern days in vain attempt to rival the soul possessing and unaffected melodies of the minstrels of ancient days.

Those who imagine that our finest melodies must be of modern origin, are not justified by an unbiased study of the subject. While many ancient airs have been elaborated and improved according to more modern tastes, the fact yet remains that the old strains have been preserved, and that our most beautiful melodies are those which are the most simple. Their origin is with few exceptions, involved in the dim obscurity of the past.

On the subject of "Melody" it may not be inappropriate to quote John Wesley who wrote "The Power of Music" in 1779.

"Modern music has been sometimes observed to have as powerful an effect as the ancient; so that frequently single persons, and sometimes numerous assemblies, have been seen in a flood of tears. But when was this? Generally, if not always, when a fine solo was sung; when the sound has been an echo to the sense; when the music has been extremely simple and inartificial, the composer having attended to melody, not harmony. Then, and then only, the natural power of music to move the passions has appeared. The music was calculated for that end, and effectually answered it."

"Upon this ground it is that so many persons are so much affected by the Scotch or Irish airs. They are composed, not according to art, but nature; they are simple in the highest degree. There is no harmony, according to the present sense of the word, therein; but there is much melody, and this is not only heard, but felt, by all those who retain their native sense."

Ireland has nurtured composers of note within the past few centuries, whose strains, while they betray an acquaintance with the refinements of modern musical art still retain a great deal of the simple and touching beauty that characterizes the earlier melodies of their country.

When Giraldus Cambrensis, the Welsh writer, visited Ireland in A. D. 1186, he found nothing which won his admiration but its music, which he speaks of in the following manner:

"The attention of this people to musical instruments I find worthy of commendation, in which their skill is beyond all comparison superior to that of any nation I have seen, for in these the modulation is not slow and solemn as in the instruments of Britain, to which we are accustomed, but the sounds are rapid and precipitate, yet at the same time sweet and pleasing. It is wonderful how in such precipitate rapidity of the fingers, the musical proportions are preserved by their art, faultless throughout in the midst of their complicated modulations and most intricate arrangement of notes, a rapidity so sweet, a regularity so irregular, a concord so discordant, the melody is rendered harmonious and perfect. Whether the chords of the diatesseron or diapente are struck together, yet they always begin in a soft mood and end in the same, that all may be perfected in the sweetness of delicious sounds, they enter on and again leave their modulations with so much subtlety and the tinglings of the small strings sport with so much freedom under the deep notes of the base, delight with so much delicacy and sooth so softly that the excellence of their art seems to be in concealing it."

Bunting in his great work "The Ancient Music of Ireland" printed in 1840, learnedly wrote of Irish Music and Irish Musical instruments and described the wonderful execution of the harpers of a century ago.

What Ireland has irretrievably lost of her musical treasures can never be estimated when it is remembered that but little more than one fourth of the compositions of O'Carolan, the last of the bards, are now in existence. According to tradition, O'Connellan his famous predecessor, composed upwards of seven hundred airs few of which are now preserved.

Of these latter, at least two have been appropriated by the Scotch and renamed. The prelude to the "Breach of Aughrim," according to Hardiman, in his "Irish Minstrelsy," is found masquerading in their music books as "Farewell to Lochaber" while "Planxty Davis," mutilated almost beyond recognition, is disguised by our northern kinsmen as the "Battle of Killicrankie" in a very inferior setting. Those melodies were introduced into Scotland after the death of the composer by his brother Lawrence.

Rory Dall O'Cahan, a celebrated blind harper of the eighteenth century, and a native of the North of Ireland, traveled into Scotland and circulated among the nobility and gentry of that country during the remainder of his life. Sir Walter Scott in one of his works introduced him as "Rory Dall the most famous harper of the Western Highlands."

This digression is merely to illustrate how Irish airs and tunes found their way into Scotland and elsewhere and were renamed or disguised to suit the fancy of poets or plagiarists. The strain and rythm of the "Campbells are Coming" can readily be discerned in "Scanduine Doighte" a common air in the South of Ireland, three settings of which are given in this collection.

Ireland from the earliest times was famous for the cultivation of the twin arts of poetry and music, and from the instances mentioned it can be plainly seen how so many original Irish airs came to be claimed by the Scotch. Since the extinction of the harpers so long patronized by the gentry, their successors, the Irish pipers and fiddlers became the custodians of what had survived of our musical heritage and through their means found a last refuge in the homes of the peasantry.

In his introduction to the "Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish," Professor W. K. Sullivan, Secretary of the Royal Irish Academy, says: "Harmonic music has now penetrated the last retreat of Irish music. The piper, like the harper, is becoming extinct and in a few years more every sound of the old music of Ireland will be thenceforth reproducible only through the labors and studies of the musical archæologist."

The pipers referred to by Professor Sullivan must not be confounded with the Highland pipers. The Irish bagpipe is a concert instrument whose tones blend harmoniously with the violin, flute and piano.

The Irish or Union pipes have been called the Irish organ and are among the sweetest of musical instruments. The formation of the reeds and the length of the pipes increased by brass tubes produce the most delightful and soothing melody, while by the addition of many keys and the capability of the chanter any tune may be preformed.

Almost all Irish music heretofore published has been harmonized to meet modern demands and frequently in keys which deprive the airs of their chief attraction, their distinctive "Bias" or "Accent", so called.

As the harmonizing of Irish tunes is invariably entrusted to a musician of the modern or German school they suffer alteration or mutilation in order to conform to the necessities of harmonization. Moore's melodies have been subjected to innumerable criticisms on this account. Our modern harmonizers including such Irishmen as Stevenson, Bishop and Balfe, (who arranged Moore's melodies for the pianoforte) and Glover, of a later date, have taken unwarranted liberties with the old airs in subjecting them to the modern school of harmony. In short, the harmonizers have robbed them of what has been aptly termed, their accent or distinctive charm.

Let us quote what Thomas Moore himself has to say on this subject: "It has always been a subject of mortification to me that my songs as they are set, give such a very imperfect notion of the manner in which I wish them to be performed and that most of that peculiarity of character which I believe they possess, as I sing them myself, is lost in the process they must undergo for publication, but the truth is, that not being sufficiently practiced in the rules of composition to rely on the accuracy of my own harmonic arrangements, I am obliged to submit my rude sketches to the eyes of a professor before they can encounter the criticism of the musical world, and, as it too frequently happens, that they are indepted for their originality to the violation of some established law, the hand that corrects their errors is almost sure to destroy their character."

Everything that may be said of the scale and tonality of Irish music applies almost equally well to Highland Scottish music, hence many airs claimed by the Scotch are undoubtedly of Irish origin, while the reverse to some extent is also true. When the same airs are claimed by two peoples, we may rightly infer that the national music of both must be closely related.

On this subject, Geminiani, a pupil of the celebrated Corelli, speaking of music in the United Kingdom says: "We have no original music except the Irish."

It has been acknowledged by every nation in Europe that music was cultivated in Ireland when melody was scarcely known in other countries.

Mr. Gunn, a Scotchman, writing in 1807, of the harp in the Highlands says: "Every research connected with the Highlands leads to their Irish origin. It has faded from the recollection of most of our countrymen, that until a late period Ireland was the school of the Highland Scotch. The gentlemen of note were educated in Ireland, to which country all who adopted poetry or music as a profession were uniformly sent to finish their education until within the memory of persons still living."

Jamieson, another Scotchman, writing in 1822, remarks: "Till within the memory of persons still living, the school for Highland poetry and music was Ireland, and thither professional men were sent to be accomplished in those arts."

Powell, Sheldon, Logan, Wharton, Martyn, Dr. Campbell, Dr. Burney, John DeFordun, John Major and many other British writers inform us that Ireland was the fountain from which music flowed into Scotland and Wales and all testify to the excellence of Irish music and musicians in their time.

In his "History of Cambria" published in 1584, Powell states that "Gruffydth ap Conan, King of North Wales brought over with him from Ireland divers cunning musicians who devised in a manner all the instrumental music that is now there used, as appeareth as well by the books written of the same as also by the names of the tunes and measures used among them to this date."

This assertion is corroborated by several other Welsh writers.

Ireland has still, in what remains of her music, much more varied and touching melody than any other nation can boast of. It is like a magnificient ruin from which every modern builder may filch desirable material to be used in the erection of new structures. Modern composers liberally avail themselves of Irish strains to flavor their otherwise insipid compositions.

Most of the scientific music which we hear nowadays is calculated only to display the brilliant execution of the performer, and many of the great musicians who perform on the violin, harp or pianoforte, to hear whom, high prices are paid, seem to disdain the use of melody altogether and could not be induced to play a simple tune as it was originally composed. Their preformances consist of a display of great execution and flourishes with little or nothing of that soul of music which appeals both to the ear and heart.

The performers not unusually come before the audience as if it were only for the purpose of tuning their instruments, and to show what they could do if they really wanted to play. They run up and down the scale in capricious phantasies straining our patience and when we think they are about to commence that for which our souls yearn, they make an obeisance and retire amid thunders of applause. Such persons cannot be called musicians, they are merely dextrous players.

Much has been written in attempting to describe what it is that distinguishes Irish music from that of other nations. Its charm and peculiarities though plainly distinctive are not easily defined. Walker, an acknowledged authority on the subject, say in his "Historical Memoirs of the Irish Bards," A. D. 1786: "The Irish music is in some degree distinguished from the music of every other nation by an insinuating sweetness which forces its way irresistibly to the heart and then diffuses an ecstatic delight that thrills through every fibre of the frame, awakens sensibility and agitates or tranquilizes the soul. Whatever passion it may be intended to excite, it never fails to awaken. We speak of the music of the ancient Irish, for music like language, the nearer we remount to its rise amongst men, the more it will be found to partake of a natural expression."

It is a well attested fact, proven in every page of their history, that the ancient Irish cultivated vocal as well as instrumental music at a very early date. The song of Praise and Thanksgiving was voiced in their worship. At the funerals the voice of lamentation was wailed in musical cadences. In war, the harpers or picturesque pipers led their hosts to battle, while at the festive board or banquet hall the tones of music stimulated the joyous passions. Such was the excellence of Irish music and musicians in days gone by, that their superiority was conceded by other nations.

An estimate of Irish music cannot to any extent be based on O'Carolan's compositions. Although the last and best known of the bards, his musical remains cannot be considered superior or even equal to many airs coming down to us from long before his time. That inimitable vein of tenderness which pervades the very old music of Erin can rarely be traced in O'Carolan's compositions. What then has caused the decay of Irish music, the extinction of the harpers, and the gradual disappearance of the once popular union piper?

Many causes have contributed to the melancholy result. A country harassed by seven centuries of intermittent war struggling against an unscrupulous foe to retain or obtain its independence could hardly be expected to maintain it superiority in literature or music.

From the time the Norman invader first set foot on Irish soil, the Irish bards and minstrels were in the habit of entering the British camp and charming their enemies with their beautiful national airs. So sweet were the performances of these men, so melodious their music that the soldiers from privates to generals refused to arrest them as spies in spite of royal decrees. The statutes of Kilkenny in 1367, forbade the Irish minstrels to enter the pale and made it a general offense to give them shelter or entertainment. King Henry the VI ordered his marshals in Ireland to imprison all the harpers they could lay hands on. Following in her ancestor's footsteps, queen Elizabeth issued an edict decreeing the hanging of all minstrels, saying: "We never can conquer Ireland as long as the minstrels are there." Lord Barrymore who was appointed to enforce this inhuman decree, took out a commission to hang every harper that could be found.

England recognized in the Irish bards a hindrance and an enemy to her dominion in Ireland, and used every available means to suppress and exterminate them. Notwithstanding the brutal and sanguinary efforts of the English kings and queens and their titled hangmen, the bards lived on down to the time of O'Carolan, who, on his deathbed in 1738, tremblingly grasped his harp and poured out his soul in that plaintive wail known as "O'Carolan's Farwell to Music."

The severe measures enacted by English parliaments intending to abolish the bardic order in Ireland, convey to us a feeling of extreme regret, for the decline of that art whose influence tended so much to soften and refine the mind, as well as for the check given to the continued development of music in the land of our forefathers.

Such, however, was the desire of the Irish for music notwithstanding the harsh measures of Elizabeth, that more than a century after her death, when inventories were made of the effects or property of adherents of James II, it was found that nearly all, even the Anglo-Norman families of the pale possessed "One Irishe Harpe."

The social changes resulting from war and confiscation of property were fraught with sad effects to the bards, who shared in the fallen fortunes of their chieftains and patrons. Those lands and endowments which had been the gifts of former national monarchs and were intended for the support of the bardic order, and which had hitherto escaped confiscation to some extent, were now forfeited together with the estates of their patrons.

Thus the greatest portion of the land fell into the possession of individuals from whom the bards received little sympathy, but rather a contrary feeling. These minstrels from their once independent position, and with the penal statutes of former reigns in operation against them, were obliged to seek the hospitality of the humble classes. Thus they traveled from one friendly door to another and were usually received with warm welcome agreeable to the cherished ways of the past.

Is it then surprising that the cultivation of music should be neglected when the condition of the bard became so sadly altered? The harpers, who were the chief composers and repositories of music, had been uniformly cherished by the nobility and gentry. A spirit of emulation roused them to competition and rivalry and such of them as were men of ability attempted to adorn their music with graces and variations. These were communicated to their successors and by them transmitted to others with additions and improvements.

By this means Irish music was partially preserved. The pipers and fiddlers and the peasantry, gifted with musical ears, have continued the process to the present time, so that the mass of Irish music in existence to-day can truly be called traditional.

Many of the harpers mentioned by Bunting in his famous work before alluded to, were blind, and so were their less renowned heirs, the pipers and fiddlers. Except in rare instances, only those who were incapable of otherwise supporting themselves were taught music as a profession, in the degenerate days of the last century; hence the term 'piper' and 'fiddler' became synonomous with poverty or mendicancy. Many an ardent young disciple had his instrument ruthlessly broken by his proud but unappreciative parent lest the respectability of the family be tarnished by having a piper or fiddler among its members.

Music and dancing were not infrequently learned clandestinely in some out of the way barn or in a glen, sheltered by hedges from unwelcome intrusion, the frown if not the ferule of the priest being more dreaded than the ire of the 'respectable' parent. Now that the 'methul' and the 'patron' and the music and dancing have been practically extirpated, the Irish people, including some of the priests, are awaking to a realization of what they have lost in the distinctive characteristics of a separate nationality.

It is to the peasantry we owe whatever is left of our musical heritage, and it is to them those have gone, who are endeavoring to preserve for posterity, those immortal strains which have conduced so much to Ireland's ancient renown.

Irish musicians, until lately, were doing nothing for Irish music, either as archaeologists or artists. There was some excuse for their apathy as collectors since unfortunately this is not a paying business, but it is unintelligible how Irish musicians should neglect such a pure fount of original melody, as exists in the unpublished airs of their country, and seek inspiration elsewhere.

The desire to preserve for posterity, the many fine airs and dance tunes unconsciously memorized from the sweet voice of a cheerful mother, who sang and lilted at her spinning wheel or while engaged at her household duties, in the farmhouse, on the banks of the river Ilen, in west Cork, where the writer spent the first years of his life, originated the comprehensive collection of unharmonized Irish music, which the writer has been patiently and laboriously compiling for years.

Dictating to an accomplished violinist, a namesake and fellow countryman from the "Black North" day after day as opportunity offered, memory recalled tune after tune and strain after strain until the number grew into hundreds. Many of them were so little known even in the vicinity of the old home, that the younger generation seems to be entirely ignorant of them.

In the metropolis of the west, one thousand miles beyond the broad Atlantic, Ireland's sons and daughters from every one of her thirty-two counties can be found, and they have brought with them treasures of song and dance music, never noted down by the great collectors, Petrie, Bunting and Joyce.

From the writer's experience while engaged in the compilation of the present work, there is much evidence to show that many localities in Ireland remained unexplored by the collectors above mentioned.

On a recent ocassion, to the astonishment and delight of a score of Irish musicians who prided themselves on their comprehensive knowledge of their country's music, a violinist who left his native valley over forty years ago, played dozens of excellent tunes, then heard for the first time by his audience. And this was but one of many similar instances.

After the writer and his skilful and versatile co-laborer had made some progress in noting down from their memories and other sources, a variety of strains hitherto unpublished, other musicians whose curosity was aroused became interested and contributed freely from their repertoires, prompted by a spirit of emulation alike creditable to their manhood and racial pride.

The interest in the collection and preservation of traditional Irish music thus awakened, attracted a coterie of sympathetic spirits who met at frequent intervals and unrestricted by rules or regulations, played on their various instruments, solo or in concert, introducing any new airs or tunes which had been gleaned since their last meeting. A vagrant strain not infrequently brought to mind some long forgotten air, and by this interchange of tunes many an elusive treasure all but lost to posterity has been recovered from oblivion and promptly noted down by our musical scribe, Mr. James O'Neill.

This collection, by far the largest ever printed, has been compiled from all available sources including several manuscript collections, scarcely decipherable from age, and which being family heirlooms were accessible only as a special favor to the compiler.

It will be observed that the music is written in keys suitable for violin, flute and union pipes as far as practicable; keys in which the old Irish strains are fairly preserved. No pretense is made that the tunes are printed as taken down from the singing, whistling or playing of those from whom many of them have been obtained, as most collectors of Irish music have done. On the contrary the settings considered the most meritorious are herein given to the public, for various are the versions of Irish airs, according to locality and individual taste.

The compiler has aimed to preserve the characteristic tonality of Irish music to the best of their ability, and only such pieces as were judged to possess merit are included in this publication, which is divided into distinctive classifications for the sake of convenience.

Obtaining proper or suitable names for many of the numbers in this work was not the least of our difficulties. Well known airs or tunes were not uncommonly known by different names in as many localities, while the names of others in ordinary circulation among musicians were forgotten or unknown.

Having been, since boyhood, an ardent lover of the music of my native land in all of its varying moods, indulgence in its fascination has been practically the only relaxation from the cares and responsibilities of a busy life. The desire to preserve for prosterity the many fine strains which have escaped the vigilance of former collectors, alone prompted the writer to engage in this congenial pursuit.

To the frequent inquiry: "Where can we get a good book of Irish music?" no reply could be given but the alliterative one-"Moore's Melodies." Not a few Irishmen, by birth or ancestry ordinarily well informed on other subjects seem to be unaware of the existence of any Irish music but that found in "Moore's Melodies," excepting perhaps the hackneyed favorites, "Rory O'Moore," "Larry O'Gaff," "The Irish Washerwoman," "Fisher's Hornpipe," etc., which are printed in all cheap pianoforte pamphlets.

No comprehensive collection of Irish music, in either harmonized or melodic form has heretofore been attempted, and it is in the hope of supplying, even though imperfectly, that which others have neglected, that the writer has ventured to place this work before the public. Whatever meed of success or popularity it may attain, will in no small degree be due to the kindly co-operation of the many exiles of Erin in Chicago who vied with each other in their zeal to aid in the enterprise. To the kindness of Messrs. John Gillan, Michael McNamara, James O'Neill, I. S. Dunning and Mrs. Mary Cantwell, I am indebted for the use of valuable manuscript collections of Irish music, heirlooms in their respective families. Honorable William J. Onahan, Professor Thomas J. Purcell and Mr. Edward Howard O'Mulligan obligingly favored me with old printed music books from their libraries. More than one-half of the contents of this volume was cheerfully contributed by the following named Irish musicians and Irish music lovers, whose memories were stored with many rare traditional strains:

Rev. Dr. Richard Henebry, Ph.D., Rev. William Dollard, Rev. James K. Fielding, Messrs. James O'Neill (scribe), John McFadden, James Early, Edward Cronin, Bernard Delaney, Adam Tobin, James Kennedy, John Ennis, Michael Dunlap, Patrick Tuohy, William Walsh, Timothy Dillon, Philip J. O'Reilly, George West, Michael Kissane, Michael Enright, John McElligott, Abram S. Beamish, James Cahill, Garrett J. Stack, James Kerwin, John K. Beatty, John Connors, Thomas Dunphy, Michael O'Brien, Patrick Mahony, John Carey, John Ryan, Charles O'Gallagher, Michael Hartnett, Robert Lawson, Miss Ellen Kennedy, Miss Mary O'Neill, Mrs. Lavin and Mrs. Fitzgerald.

The editor most gratefully acknowledges his indebtedness also to Rev. John J. Carroll for his encouragement and moral support, and for his invaluable assistance in arranging and perfecting the bilingual names of the Melodies.

No alluring prospect of financial gain stimulated the efforts of those who originated the work and unselfishly devoted their spare moments for years to their hobby of collecting and classifying Irish music. If the sons of Hibernia and lovers of Irish music generally, in whose interest this work is undertaken, evince a due appreciation of "The Music of Ireland" the consciousness of having accomplished something helpful in the rehabilitation of Irish National music will be ample reward for the labors of its promoters.
